Low-fat vegan diet may be better for weight loss than a Mediterranean diet

"Animal products including meat, fish, eggs, and cheese cause the body to produce more acid, increasing dietary acid load, which is linked to chronic inflammation that disrupts metabolism and can lead to increased body weight. Plant-based diets, on the other hand, which are more alkaline, are associated with weight loss, improved insulin sensitivity, and lower blood pressure."

This study was a secondary analysis based on a previous trial involving overweight adults who followed either a Mediterranean diet or a low-fat vegan diet. In this analysis, researchers focused on the dietary acid load of each diet and its relationship to weight changes.

The original trial included 62 overweight adults, divided into two groups—one followed the Mediterranean diet and the other the low-fat vegan diet for 16 weeks. After a 4-week break, the groups switched diets. Participants recorded their food intake through food diaries, and researchers also gathered information on physical activity and body composition.

Two scoring methods were used to estimate dietary acid load—both assessed five key nutrients, with one method also factoring in height and weight. The results showed that dietary acid load significantly decreased on the low-fat vegan diet, but remained unchanged on the Mediterranean diet.

Pharma Bulletin

Participants also experienced weight loss, primarily from reduced body fat, during the low-fat vegan phase but not while on the Mediterranean diet. Importantly, reductions in dietary acid load were positively correlated with weight loss—suggesting that lower acid load was linked to weight reduction.

While these correlations weakened slightly after adjusting for calorie intake during the first 16 weeks, they remained statistically significant during the second phase of the study, even after adjustments. Based on these findings, the researchers concluded that the low-fat vegan diet reduced dietary acid load and supported weight loss independent of energy intake when compared to the Mediterranean diet.

However, the study had limitations: a small sample size, short duration, single-center data, and reliance on self-reported food and activity records. Additionally, about 16% of participants dropped out, though adherence among those who completed the study was high.

Lead researcher Kahleova suggested that future studies should explore strategies to reduce dietary acid load and its possible links to chronic diseases like diabetes and heart disease. The authors also emphasized the need for randomized controlled trials to examine the Mediterranean diet's impact on acid load more closely.

Dr. Mir Ali, a bariatric surgeon not involved in the study, commented that the findings indicate a low-fat vegan diet may offer more advantages than diets including animal products, though further investigation is needed to understand the mechanisms involved.

This research points to the potential benefits of a low-fat vegan diet, particularly its ability to lower dietary acid load and promote weight loss. Such a diet may be especially helpful for individuals with chronic conditions such as obesity, gout, or inflammatory diseases.

By Varis B.Pharm (1st Year)

Dr. Alexander S. Ford, a physician and dietitian not involved in the study, stated that while the diet may not be suitable for everyone, its alkalizing effect and association with weight loss could benefit those with certain health issues. He also stressed the importance of a balanced, plant-rich diet, regardless of specific dietary preferences, to support overall health.
